"If you don't come out and see a show, then you're very silly indeed. Because, soon you'll need to be giving a cut to Ticketmaster." -Pete Harris (IndieSoundsNY)

"As the name suggests, these two will tear you apart, like sibling bear cubs."

-Whitey Houston (Edmonton Vue)

Like a fired bullet caught between pressed fingers, we're living in a race. We saunter while technology sprints, ignoring all the rules that hold us back. Caught in a web that brings us closer than we've ever been, yet miles apart, we damn each other's victories and secretly celebrate each other's losses. When we meet face-to-face, there's no need to talk; we already know.

"We're losing our instincts and in a state of unconsciousness we're more machine than man." (Violent Kin - People)

On September 20, Violent Kin will release their second full-length album, "People". From grinding, chanting beats to sifting melancholy simplicity, "People" is a snapshot of the time we're living in. The album was self-produced by the Kardash siblings in S.J.'s home studio in Saskatoon, SK. Evolving in the same electro-rock vein as their previous work, their new release gives nods to 90's dance beats and synth from every decade, while chorused guitar keeps fighting for the spotlight.

Violent Kin debuted in 2009, but Maygen and S.J. Kardash have been making music together since they were kids. From orchestras to musical projects that have taken them to stages as far as China, the siblings are always pushing forward. The Kin and their band have already toured most of North America, highlighted with showcases at CMJ, Canadian Music Week and North by Northeast and a summer residency in New York City. With their new release, "People", Violent Kin is showing no signs of slowing down.
